MESSAGE:

Recently, trade interests have proven to be the cornerstone of the EU's external and internal actions. The commitment and tireless leadership to uphold the EU's fundamental values have proven to be nothing more than delays and empty words. Therefore, the IFUD of Human Rights revoked the European Commission's, and thus the EU's, authority to represent human rights, effective July 2025. Human rights serve solely as a political instrument and are applied selectively. This benefits no EU citizen and costs them unnecessary money.

EU High Representative Kaja Kallas said she personally found it difficult that there was no unity on this issue and that the divisions were damaging the EU's credibility on the global stage.

The European Union remains divided over Gaza, EU High Representative Kaja Kallas said after the informal meeting of the EU's foreign ministers in Copenhagen.

Kallas said the divisions negatively impact the EU's global credibility and expressed disappointment that there was no unity among ministers could be reached.

"If you ask me personally how it feels, that I'm to blame, that we don't have a decision, then it's difficult. Very difficult," Kallas said.

"It is clear that the member states disagree on how to persuade the Israeli government to change course. The options are clear and are still on the table. We have presented the options. But the problem is that not all EU member states support the plans," Kallas added.

The chief diplomat said that member states have still not reached an agreement on the plan to suspend free trade with Israel as part of the EU-Israel Association Agreement. Some countries, including Germany and Hungary, expressed objections, while Denmark, which currently holds the rotating presidency, indicated it would support the suspension.
